Part of the “Golden Age of the Concrete Jungle” Series — a deep dive into the era that shaped modern sneaker culture.

Sneaker wars weren't just about design.

They were about control.

In 1989, Patrick Ewing stepped outside the traditional endorsement model and launched Ewing Athletics—marking a major shift toward athlete ownership and independent brand positioning within basketball culture

The 33 HI became a symbol of independence—bold, visible, and built with presence. Its oversized structure and aggressive ankle support reflected the visual identity of New York basketball during the late 80s and early 90s

British Knights approached power differently.

Rather than competing directly on performance metrics, BK aligned itself with cultural influence. Hip-hop artists became the face of the movement, helping establish a street-first identity that separated the brand from traditional athletic marketing structures

By the mid-1990s, minimalism replaced the oversized aesthetics that once defined the era. At the same time, damaging rumors—including the false claim that “BK” stood for “Blood Killer”—created real-world backlash, contributing to school bans and a decline in mainstream visibility

Ownership of British Knights eventually transitioned through multiple phases, including acquisition by Frasers Group in 2022 as part of the brand's continued restructuring and nostalgia-era revival strategy
